EITHER — OR, aut—aut: vel—vel: sivĕ (seu)—sive (seu). Obs. (1) Aut is objective, and refers to a real difference in the things or notions themselves: vel is subjective, and relates to a difference between them as contemplated by the mind of the person who is speaking or acting about them; aut—aut, therefore, should be used when things are strongly opposed in their own nature, aut dives aut pauper; aut frigus aut calor; aut Cicero aut Pompeius, &c. Aut—aut should also be used in the sense of either, or at least [aut in omni, aut in magnâ parte vitæ, Cic., Tusc., 3, 17, 28]. Aut—aut may stand in interrogative and comparative sentences, and may follow negatives. (2) Vel—vel. In aut—aut the members necessarily exclude each other; in vel—vel they only exclude each other arbitrarily, according to the view of the speaker, and it is not implied that they might not possibly coexist. Vel—vel sometimes approaches to the meaning of sive—sive: i. e., the speaker conceives the things as different indeed, but not essentially, so that it is immaterial which is taken: pace vel Quirini vel Romuli dixerim. The second vel may be strengthened by etiam, vero etiam, or omnino. (3) Sive—sive is the "either—or" of indifference, the speaker leaving it undecided, from ignorance or any other motive, which name, supposition, &c., is the correct one; e. g., sive casu, sive consilio; sive felicitate quadam, sive bonitate naturæ, &c. In the best prose, especially in Cicero, sive—sive is used; with the exception, however, of Cæsar, who has often seu—seu. In post-Aug. writers, we have also sive—seu, or seu—sive. The second sive may be strengthened by etiam. (4) After negatives, the usual way of translating "either—or" is by (neque)—neque; e. g., nemo unquam neque poeta neque orator fuit; nihil loci est neque segnitiæ neque socordiæ [vid. end of Obs. 1, on aut]. Not either —or, neque (nec)—neque (nec). Either —or even, aut—aut etiam, aut—aut vero (the second being the stronger supposition): vel—vel etiam; vel etiam vero; vel omnino. ☞ The aut or vel may be repeated three or more times. The first aut may also be omitted, just as in English; we must (either) conquer or die, hic (aut) vincendum, aut moriendum milites.

EITHER (of the two), alterŭter (either one or the other): uter, utercunque (mostly "which," "whichever" of the two; but sometimes = "either;" e. g., si uter [orator et decumanus] velit): uterlibet: utervis (either of the two indifferently): utrum mavis (which of the two you choose). Nor did he wish to deprive the state of either army, neque rempublicam alterŭtro exercitu privare voluit: if any one had not been of either side, si qui non alteriusutrius partis fuisset: take or choose either, utrumlibet elige or utrum horum mavis accipe: in either way the consequence will be a great confusion, utrocunque modo summa sequetur confusio (Quint., 3, 6, 29). I have less strength than either of you, minus habeo virium, quam utervis vestrûm: let either abuse the other, uterque utrumque vituperato. Not—either, neuter; on either (= each) side, alterutrimque (Plin., 20, 7, 26).
